Indian academic 'disappointed' in Australia's carbon policy shift

Indian climate change expert says he's disappointed in the Australian Government's plans to repeal carbon pricing legislation.

A leading Indian voice on climate change says he's disappointed in the Australian Government's plans to repeal its carbon pricing legislation.

Dr Prodipto Ghosh is a Distinguished Fellow at the Energy and Resources Institute in New Delhi, and the principal author of India's national climate change action plan.

Dr Ghosh is on a number of climate change government, business and industry environment groups, and is a keen observer of global environmental policies.

Australian Parliament is sitting this week for the first time since the Coalition won government in September.

The Coalition this week plans to introduce a number of bills to repeal the former Labor Government’s carbon trading scheme into the House of Representatives.

It's a move being watched by Dr Ghosh in India.
